Golf Course

David Trump

November 5, 2020

Many people say no to golf because of being afraid of hurting our Mother Earth. For one thing, a golf course might lead to water scarcity because it needs a lot of water every day. For another, some animals might lose their homes because people have to clear more than 600,000 square meters of land to build a golf course. More than that, animals and plants may die because of pesticides.

Several groups are trying to stop building golf courses all over the world. However, some studies show: Golf courses play important roles in the environment. By using special ways, golf courses can protect lakes, ponds or rivers in or near them, and provide natural areas for plants and animals.

In fact, there is no need for us to worry about having golf courses. With hundreds and thousands of factories in the world, golf courses are getting more and more popular because they are nicer to look at. When we try to stop building golf courses, we should think whether this is the best answer to save our Mother Earth.

Students from Honor Junior High School started to grow vegetables and fruit on school land two years ago. The idea came from some of their parents. Those parents were born and grew up in the country but worked and built their own families in the city. They miss their young life; it was closely connected with nature. They hope that their kids are still able to get close to the land and learn to respect life. Most important of all, they want their kids to learn to help each other when doing the farming outside the classroom. What's more, the students learn to share the harvest from the land with other people. They give the vegetables and fruits to the nursing home and the children's home. They cook the vegetables and clean the fruits there. They enjoy the food with the old and listen to their life stories. The old teach the kids to prepare the food and help them with their homework. All of these become touching stories in the newspaper and beautiful experiences in those students' life.

Just as one of the school teachers says, "Learning is not only happening in the classroom. Learning is never only from the textbooks. Life itself is an interesting textbook. I'm so happy that my students, as well as their parents, make learning become something meaningful and much more exciting."
